The end of Adobe Flash? For the Commuter in You

The ubiquitous Adobe Flash usage and support are waning rapidly. Google has withdrawn its support, Mozilla's Firefox and Facebook have also discontinued supporting Flash.

This mostly has to do with security flaws. These "so-called zero-day vulnerabilities (a security hole that hackers find before the software company does) are found on Flash with such regularity they almost feel like a feature," from Brian Barret at wired.com.

In an interview with Media Daily News, Brightcove CEO David Mendels offers, "there's no perfectly secure system. There's a constant race between those who build secure technology for the open Internet and hackers who continually try to exploit the system. Today, those technologies are healthy. They're being advanced by Apple, Google, Facebook and others." Analysts expect that over time HTML5 will suffer from similar security risks, but for now it's taking over a space that Flash once dominated and perhaps signaling the end of Flash altogether.

One way or another you're probably checking your phone before or on the way to work (if you're not driving) in the morning (and afternoon). We thought our fellow commuters might enjoy a short list of some of our favorites.

For the transit power user, Citymapper is qualified commuter partner. A free app that bookmarks work and home, recommends efficient seating based on your stops and gives you options from point A to B.

For those in their cars, Google Maps is among the best as well as Apple Maps if that's how you roll. If you're looking for a more 'social' commute then the app Waze aggregates user data to suggest optimal routes.

For the kick back and relax commute how about Audible for the latest best sellers or ever entertaining classics. Overcast is a good app for podcasts and programs. You can download your favorites and then listen to them off-line. Streaming is available too.
